On your path...

Crop terraces (faïsses) (A)

You are taking paths that were once used by farmers to access their often very steep land, which they had laid out in faïsses (terraces). Here, they grew mulberry trees to feed to their silkworms as well as grains and chestnuts. You can see the vestiges of this agriculture, where every mas (isolated farm) had buildings known as magnaneries to breed silkworms and clèdes to dry chestnuts. Despite the substantial rural flight over the last two centuries, you can be almost sure to encounter chestnut farmers, goat or sheep farmers, market gardeners or beekeepers.

Hamlet of Le Puech (B)

This mediaeval hamlet was built from schist, lauzes (tilestones) and red roof tiles, and has been renovated using traditional techniques.
